

3. How did Newton contribute to the understanding of colours, and what significant realisation did he make during his experiment?

Ans - Newton's theory was that each colour was a wave of light and could be refracted by something, he used a prism as a refracting object in his experiment. He performed what scientists called 'Experimentum Crucis'. He proved them incorrect by demonstrating that white light contains all colours and the significant realisation was that the prism was just a refracting object which separates colours based on their ability to bend.
